

Where to See Birds

Greenwood Furnace State Park has varied habitat and enjoys a large variety of birds. Though small, the lake at Greenwood attracts some migrant waterfowl during spring and autumn, including green-winged teals, ring-necked ducks, buffleheads, hooded mergansers, pied-billed grebes and common loons. Stormy weather during the spring season may cause more rare species to stop in and wait out the storm. Ospreys and bald eagles can sometimes be seen overhead, while spotted sandpipers feed along the water's edge. Tree and barn swallows swoop over the water, feeding on aquatic insects during peak migration and occasionally during the summer.

Mallards, Canada geese, and wood ducks may summer in small numbers. Great blue herons are commonly seen at the lake, or flying slowly overhead in and out of Rothrock State Forest. A breeding colony is near Greenwood Furnace.

Shrubby areas bordering the lake, streams, and lawns of the park are excellent habitat. Regular breeders include ruby-throated hummingbirds, eastern phoebes, Carolina wrens, American robins, eastern bluebirds, gray catbirds, common yellowthroats, chipping and song sparrows, northern cardinals and Baltimore orioles. During migration, a great variety of flycatchers, thrushes, warblers, and sparrows may be found feeding in these areas, perhaps attracted by abundant insect food. Bad weather sometimes means good birding as birds are forced down from the sky or may feed more actively when they need calories to sustain their high metabolism on cold mornings. Often, birds are found concentrated in places where the sun strikes early in the morning.

Forested areas of the park are accessible by the excellent trail systems. Deciduous forests dominate. Abundant breeders are wood-pewees, red-eyed vireos, wood thrushes, ovenbirds, eastern towhees, and scarlet tanagers. Year-round birds include black-capped chickadees, tufted titmice, white-breasted nuthatches and five woodpecker species. In coniferous forests, acadian flycatchers, golden-crowned kinglets, black-throated green and Blackburnian warblers, and hermit thrushes may be found during migration and as uncommon summer breeders.

The calls of whip-poor-wills are a special treat from early May through mid-summer. During autumn, scan the sky overhead as raptors move south following the ridgeline of Stone Mountain towering above the park on its south edge. Sharp-shinned, Cooper's, broad-winged, and red-tailed hawks are the most common raptors. On cold, windy November days, golden eagles are a distinct possibility. In early winter, the hoots of great horned owls signal the beginning of their nesting season.
